

Learning from Country: Australian Aboriginal Land Stewardship as a Model Social System in Climate Crisis

Lili Schmidt

<https://orcid.org/0000-0002-9006-298>

Philosophiae Doctor

May 2036

School of Anthropology and Climate Resilience

Humboldt University Berlin

This thesis has been produced
as a total of the requirements of Ph.D
at Humboldt University, Berlin.

Acknowledgements

This thesis would not be possible without the guidance and help from my supervisor, Prof Julia Walter – thank you for guiding me through the myriad difficulties of thesis-writing and making the toil enjoyable, against all odds. I would also like to thank my committee, Prof Galdikas-Nguyen and Dr Mai-Anh Karan, for helpful feedback. And, importantly, the entire PhD cohort at the School of Anthropology and Climate Resilience at Humboldt University in Berlin: it has been an enormous privilege and pleasure to spend three years learning about the many exciting systems of indigenous ecosystem knowledge currently being implemented by governments around the world, from Mexico to Bangladesh, and from the northernmost Canada to Tierra del Fuego. The robust exchange of opinions and a sometimes humbling critique of my own Australocentricity has been the needed stimulant that made this thesis – hopefully – better.

I also have to thank Australia's Federal Department of Climate Adaptation and Mitigation, which has funded this research through their Bruce Pascoe Fellowship program. Alongside its work in ensuring that the world's driest continent is managed in a long-term sustainable way, the FDCAM is also a national research and innovation hub when it comes to researching social systems for communal, sustainable and socially equitable land management. I am one of many young people who have been funded by the Department to study internationally, and I am humbled and proud to be in this cohort which is changing the ways of Australia's federal land management policy. I cannot wait to return to Australia to complete the conditions of my scholarship.

I am also thankful to my family, Johanna and the kiddos, for the infinite patience and loving support in the face of more than one late-night tantrum when the transcription of oral histories became hard, when the Berlin archives would not release their botanical records, or when the video connection to Arrernte dropped in the middle of ceremony. You have been a model of Teutonic resilience, and I am forever grateful.

And, finally, to aunty Isabel, with love. You have been an inspiration and a spiritual guide over the years. Despite our many disagreements and sometimes fierce arguments, my journey here would not have been possible without you. I hope you are happy, wherever you are.

Student declaration of sole authorship

This doctoral thesis represents my own work and due acknowledgement is given whenever information is derived from other sources. No part of this dissertation has been or is currently submitted for any other qualification at any other university.

Signed:

